Homerun J. Frank Baker, from Frappe, Md. "Will he do it again?" The question was clearly in the mouth of every one in that crowd. "Can he repeat?"

"Strike one, ball one," said the board, and then and then, quick as a flash, almost as soon as the crowd in New York watched the leather go into the rightfield bleachers, the light on the board flashed think.

Act Just Like Ball Crowd.

The tenth inning was featureless, but the eleventh, when two runs came across on as many hits and an error, brought the culmination of the hopes of those trailing behind the White Elephants. It was not until Meyers had been caught stealing in New York's half, making the third out, and making sure that the Mackmen had taken the bulge in the series, that, the crowd budged. Then it wended its way just as any other ordinary, well-behaved basehall crowd would do.

The game, with all its thrills, with all its opportunities grasped and all its opportunities grasped and all its opportunities wasted, with its times to yell and its times to deride—everything had been clearly, graphically and instantaneously told on the electric scoreboard, from a wire which came direct from the ball park to The Times-Dispatch Building and operated by expert operators from the Western Union.
